Olefin polymerization is generally carried out by catalysts comprising titanium, vanadium and an electron donor compound. The polymerization catalysts are typically supported in a manner to have high activity. WO2009/063897 discloses a process for preparing a supported catalyst component for an olefin polymerization catalyst, comprising reacting at least one organo-aluminum compound and an alkyl aluminum halide with the product of a hydrolysis reaction of titanium alkoxides with water in the presence of an inert organic solvent. However, an alkyl aluminum halide is typically used in an amount of at least 30% based on titanium alkoxides in order to obtain an amorphous titanium alkoxide support. Therefore, the activity of the titanium alkoxide support is not as high as that of a crystalline titanium alkoxide support, and a large amount of polymer is formed in the process. Further, an organic solvent is used as the solvent. It is very difficult to recover an organic solvent used in the preparation process. The preparation process is thus not economical. WO2009/035811 describes the preparation of a catalyst system comprising a support and a solid catalyst component, the solid catalyst component comprising a compound of a Group 3 to 6 metal element, an organo-metallic compound of a Group 4 metal, an electron donor compound, and an organic carrier material. However, when the support is an amorphous titanium alkoxide, the activity thereof is poor. Further, the halogen atom may affect the polymerization activity of the titanium alkoxide. U.S. Pat. No. 6,537,941 describes a process for preparing a catalyst system comprising a support and a solid catalyst component, wherein the support is obtained by subjecting at least one organo-aluminum compound, and a halide of a Group 2 metal and at least one alkoxide of a Group 4 metal, to hydrolysis reaction in the presence of an organic solvent. However, the halide of a Group 2 metal may affect the
