He became greatly interested in the Indian question during his early residence at Amherst, Mass., where his parents had made a home for them. To examine the evils of Indian treaty-making, he secured a charter from the Congregational church to hold a General Court, and thus preceded the Legislature in the movement which resulted in the founding of the State University.

So deeply interested in Indian affairs did he become, that he abandoned a promising career as a Congregational minister in 1781, and went to Springfield, to assist John Adams in fighting the Revolution. His sympathy with the Indians led him into rivalry with the Congregational church. Instead of remaining in Massachusetts, he took his residence in Mansfield, and gained distinction as a lawyer and a judge. In 1812, he
