The incident, which was reported by The Washington Post on Tuesday, was one of several touching episodes during the Obama administration, when a number of lawmakers and political aides were accused of inappropriately touching women or making lewd remarks. A number of the alleged incidents reportedly involved Biden and Sanders, and Sanders said Tuesday she was not aware of the incident, which she had not seen. The aide, who was a Biden staffer, allegedly put his hands around the woman's waist as she stood behind Obama. The Biden staffer was removed from the White House after the alleged incident, according to the Post, but Sanders said she wasn't sure who or what was done to remove him. In a statement, the Biden campaign said it was "completely inappropriate for the individual to make physical contact with another individual," and the campaign did not immediately provide further details. "The vice president was not aware of the individual's presence and was in no way aware of the alleged incident," the statement continued. "He was also not aware that the individual left the White House that same day. We take these matters very seriously and have been confident in the White House
