Third-party management of health information in organizations with point-of-care technology. The current healthcare infrastructure is costly and complex, with gaps in care and disparities in quality. Mobile health and point-of-care technologies are being implemented in medical offices in attempt to improve patient care and reduce healthcare costs. To date, nearly all these devices rely on some form of intra- and inter-operability to interact with patients, clinicians, electronic medical records, and external service providers. Depending on the device used, the systems are based on proprietary or open-standard protocols with varying degrees of reliability. The device will invariably result in an error; however, physicians and technologists will demand accurate response times to ensure safe patient care. Most solutions are proprietary and require Third Party Management (TPM), which in turn, requires a dedicated network and system infrastructure. The goal of TPM is to ensure care is delivered in a timely manner for both the patient and provider, no matter how the communication is accomplished.
